How to find out
who is standing for election and what they think

Why is this important?

In a local election, you choose who represents you on your local council.

Some areas are also looked after by Combined Authority Mayors. Read our separate guide to learn more about this:

It is important to know who is standing for election and what they think about issues that matter to you.

This can help you make the best choice for you when you are voting.

Where can I find a list of candidates?

Your local council website

– Councils publish a list of candidates in the weeks leading up to the election.

The Electoral Commission website

– In the run up to elections, you can enter your postcode on The Electoral Commission website to find out who the candidates in your area are.

Use this space to write down your postcode:

You can also look up where your polling station is, and who to contact if you need help.

How to find out what candidates think

Candidates share their views in different ways. You can:

Look at their website or social media - Many candidates post their views online.

Go to a local meeting or debate - Some candidates talk to people in their community.

Flyers and leaflets - Sometimes local councillors will share flyers with their views and plans.

Ask them questions – You can send an email or talk to them in person.

Contact them – See our other guides to learn how to contact your councillor and how to make the most from talking to your councillor:
